LOVE TO SCATTER STUFF!

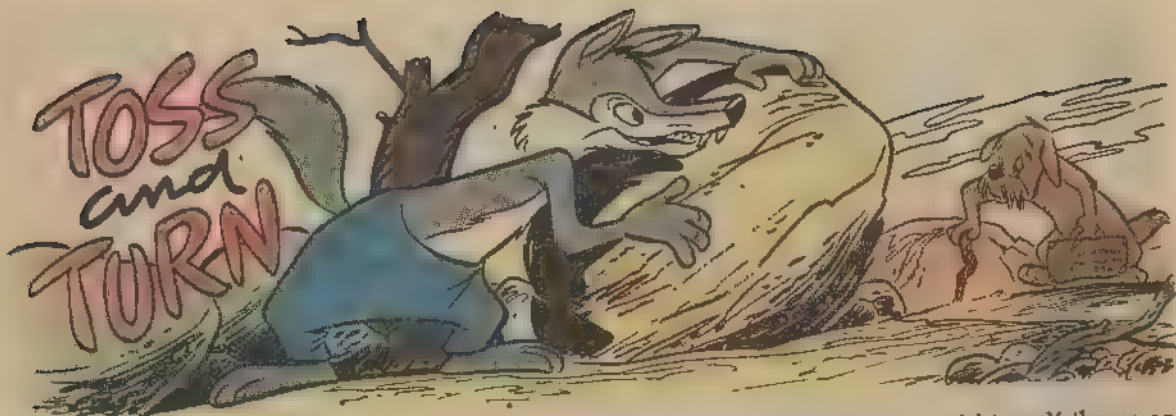

One day, Charlie Coyote was skulking in the shadow of a large rock, brooding over his lack of success in capturing Wuff, the prairie dog, and his pal, Sammy Squirrel.

"Those wily rascals have outwitted me at every turn," he muttered to himself in a complaining tone of voice. "If things go on like this much longer, I'll have to turn in my Craven Coyote badge and look for some respectable form of employment."

The very thought, however, made the villainous Charlie turn pale to the ends of his ears, and he began peering cautiously around from behind the rock. If he couldn't catch Wuff and Sammy, maybe he could surprise some other hapless creature.

Sure enough, down the dusty road came a little old prairie dog with long, gray whiskers, supporting himself on a gnarled cane and carrying a burdensome suitcase.

"Ah, ha!" chortled Charlie in glee. "A victim at last! And old and feeble, too!"

Just as Charlie was about to spring, from behind the rock, however, he caught sight of the legend printed on the suitcase.

One look at the words, "Jujitsu Champion, 1896," and Charlie Coyote decided that this prairie dog was not for him.

"But what," muttered Charlie thoughtfully to himself, "is this jujitsu champion up to? If he's going to visit Wuff, my chasing days are over."

Charlie's worst expectations came true, for the little old prairie dog soon turned from the road and headed for Wuff's home.

"This is awful!" groaned Charlie, clutching his brow. "Now that fellow will teach those scoundrels how to defend themselves, and what will I be able to do against two slippery little jujitsu experts?"

No sooner had he asked himself the question than an idea began to gleam in his eyes. "Why, of course," he cried. "I just need to learn a little jujitsu myself."

Charlie headed determinedly for Osbert Owl's lending library, confident that he had solved his problem.

Unknown to him, he had made one mistake. He had not made certain that Wuff and Sammy were learning jujitsu tactics, and, truly, they were not. Wuff's uncle, Panamint Prairie Dog, had merely come to pay a visit.

After several days of sight-seeing, the old-timer continued on his journey. Wuff and Sammy saw him off, returning together down the road toward Wuff's home.

Suddenly a very threatening Charlie loomed in their path, and the two little friends cowered together in fear.

"Oh, ho!" laughed Charlie, certain that his new knowledge of jujitsu would now stand him in good stead. "So you two have become jujitsu experts, have you?" he continued, while Sammy and Wuff stared at one another in bewilderment. "Well, I've outsmarted both of you, because I know jujitsu, too," he chuckled. "Just watch this."

Charlie lunged forward, expecting some sort of resistance, but Sammy and Wuff remained rooted to the spot, too frightened to move a muscle. Charlie merely succeeded in flipping himself through the air and, as a result, landed flat on his back.

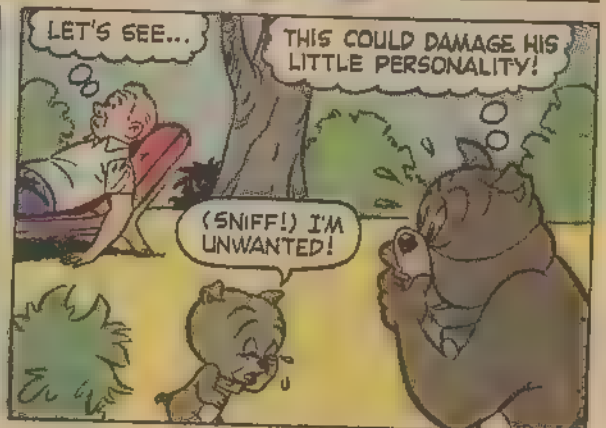

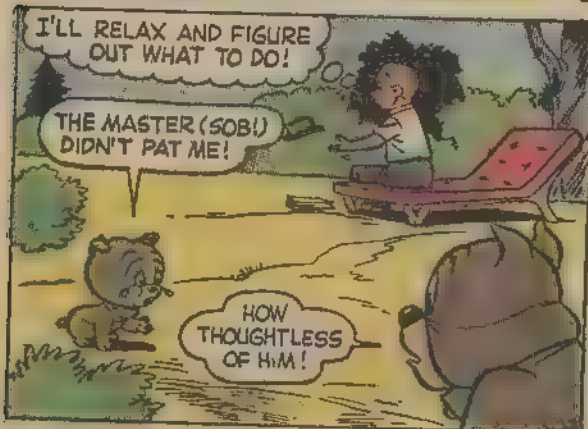

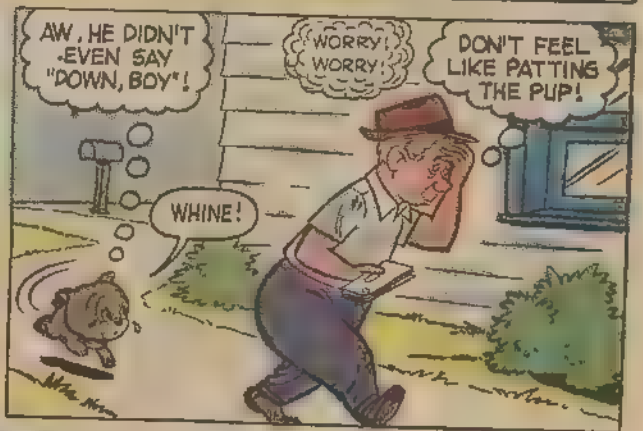

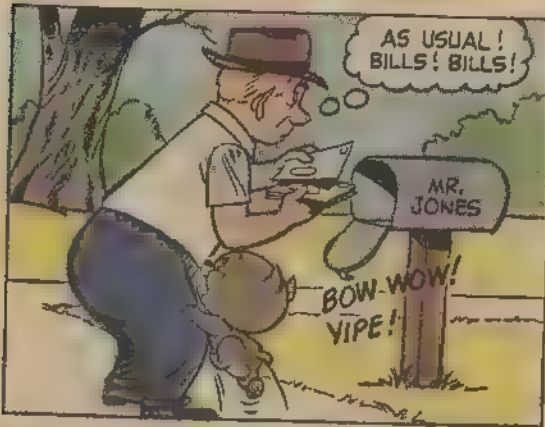

"Yiui!" he yelled. "It works too well!"

"I'll bet he thought your uncle was going to teach us jujitsu," giggled Sammy as he and Wuff scampered to safety.

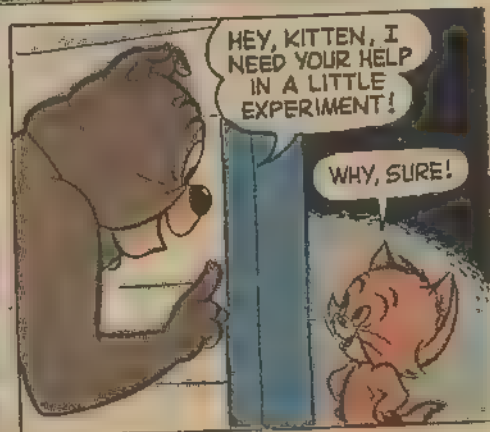

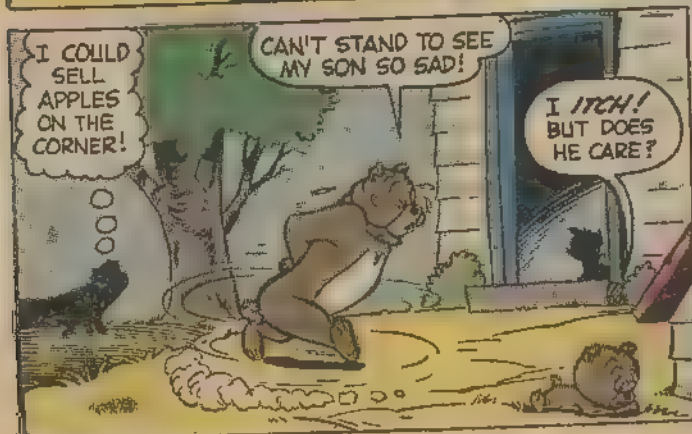

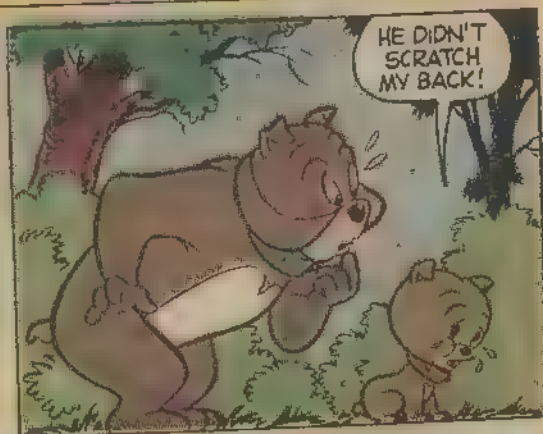

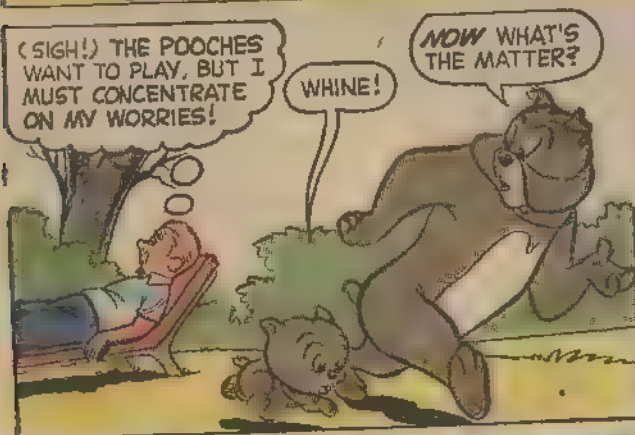

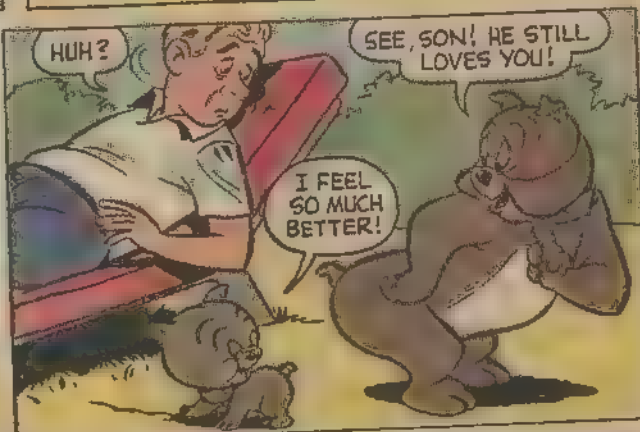

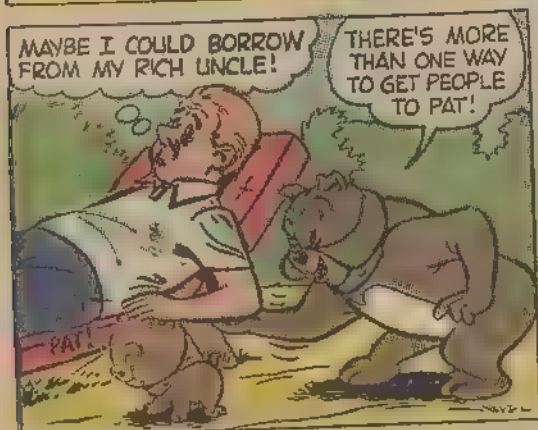

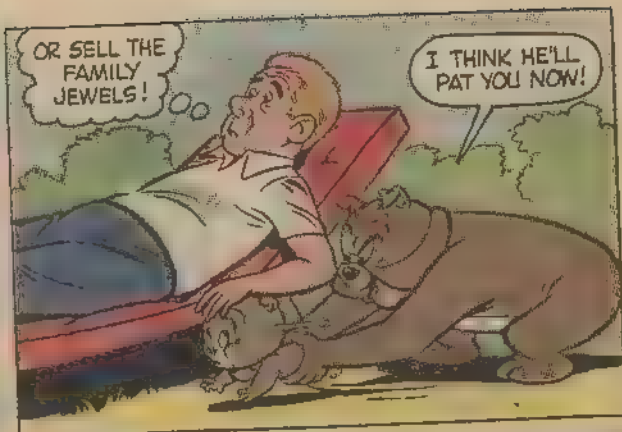

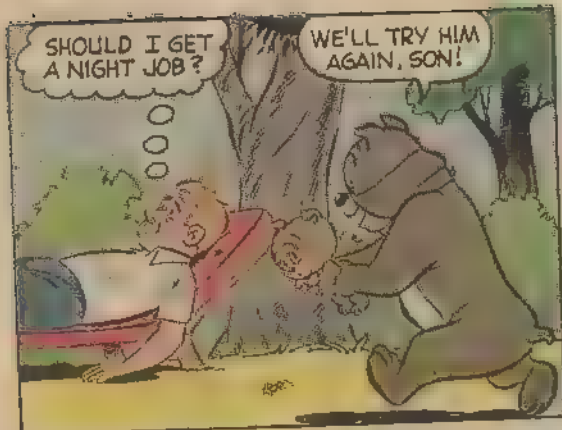

"I'll bet so, too," agreed Wuff with a grin. "But instead of outsmarting us, it looks as if he just out-jujitsued himself!"
